Unveiling the Theories: From Speculation to Possibilities

In the aftermath of MH370's disappearance, a plethora of theories emerged, each attempting to explain the inexplicable. Carter meticulously analyzes the most prominent theories, weighing their plausibility against the available evidence.

What happened to flight MH370?

A possible cause - The wreckage would have disappeared in mid-air, courtesy of other factors that would be difficult to find. However, authorities reckon that the two passengers will face Malaysia's court, possibly be linked with them.

A tracking - If the plane was hijacked, it would have needed to land somewhere in secret, such as on an island overlooked by military. The fact that some passengers' cell phones are still ringing is a clue to speculate that the plane was hijacked. Yet it is hard to find a place of 400 tonnes weight capacity. The runway would need to be long enough too (at least 2.2 km).

Mechanical problems - If the plane had had technical issues, it would not have been able to climb for more than 300 km, even with both engines started. It would not have been able to land on its belly on the ocean surface. The Boeing 777 is regarded as one of the most reliable planes. Had it crashed, it might not have ended up in the open sea. Some of Malaysia's flight instructors — especially since it happened in 2014. This will complicate the search.

Pilot error - So far there is no indication that the pilot had made an error. Some compare this incident with that of the Air France aircraft which disappeared between Rio de Janeiro and Paris in 2009. In that instance, the plane experienced problems due to weather circumstances and the pilots interpreted it incorrectly.
