In her new book, Unvaccinated: How Canada Turned to Hatred and Division, award-winning journalist and author Tara Henley explores the deep divisions that have emerged in Canada over the issue of vaccination. The book is a powerful and provocative examination of the forces that have led to this division, and it offers a compelling argument for why we need to find a way to bridge this gap.

Henley begins the book by recounting her own experiences with vaccination. She describes how she was vaccinated as a child without any problems, and how she has continued to vaccinate her own children. However, she also acknowledges that there are a growing number of Canadians who are hesitant about vaccination, and she sets out to understand why.

Henley interviews a wide range of Canadians who have different views on vaccination. She speaks to parents who are concerned about the safety of vaccines, to doctors who are frustrated by the spread of misinformation, and to politicians who are trying to navigate the complex issue of vaccine policy. Through these interviews, Henley provides a nuanced and balanced perspective on the vaccination debate.

One of the most striking things about Unvaccinated is Henley's ability to humanize the issue. She shows us the faces of the people who are affected by the vaccination debate, and she helps us to understand their fears and concerns. This is not an abstract issue for Henley; it is a personal one.

Henley argues that the vaccination debate is not simply a matter of science. It is also a matter of trust. Many Canadians have lost trust in the government and in the medical establishment, and this mistrust has made them more likely to believe misinformation about vaccines. Henley argues that we need to rebuild this trust if we want to find a way to bridge the gap between the vaccinated and the unvaccinated.

Unvaccinated is a timely and important book. It is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand the deep divisions that have emerged in Canada over the issue of vaccination. Henley provides a powerful and provocative argument for why we need to find a way to bridge this gap, and she offers a roadmap for how we can do it.
